

British Museum #EA649. traced from a compilation of museum website photos.

Height: 34 centimeters, width: 106.5 centimeters (42 inches long)

“Limestone temple-relief of Ptolemy I offering to Hathor: Ptolemy I wears a bag wig and a single string of beads, and presents to Hathor the heraldic plants of Upper and Lower Egypt, respectively a lily-like sedge and a papyrus. The plants, which are rendered as stiff little baubles, may well depict royal gifts to the temple, made of gold and other precious materials. Hathor holds the papyrus scepter of a goddess and wears a vulture cap, topped by a platform that supported her emblematic cow horns and sun disk. Both figures look well fed, pleased with themselves and with each other. Traces of paint survive.” (From museum website)
